Hebrew מַרְחֶשֶׁת (marchesheth) LEV 2:7, LEV 7:9

Description and usage:

The griddle was a thick plate made of pottery (and later of metal) with small depressions similar to a modern waffle iron. It was placed on three stones between which a fire was built. Bread dough was then put on the surface of the griddle and cooked.

Translation:

In some languages translators may have to render the Hebrew word machvath as “flat cooking pan” or “flat iron for baking.”

In EZK 4:3 it is not the function of the griddle that is important but its form. Most translations use a more general term here, such as “iron pan” (GNT) or “iron plate” (RSV).
